A lot of current art — too much — falls under the heading “Doing Things to and With Photography.” Collage, photomontage, appropriation, rephotography and video animation all qualify. A distressing amount of contemporary painting is photo dependent.

Proceeding modestly and in sync with her long-time interest in popular culture, Sara Greenberger Rafferty has found some new ground that combines analog and digital, chance and control, paint and pixels. She began by scanning and printing images of some well-known comedians, including Goldie Hawn, Vicki Lawrence, Bill Cosby and Madeline Kahn. She then uploaded the printouts onto her computer, which blurred the colors and disfigured the faces and, after some in-computer manipulations, reprinted them as photographs.

The result are mysterious wisps of personality and expression, hovering on the brink of familiarity. They have a forensic aura, like evidence rescued from the elements, and evoke the fading of fame and youth. Ms. Hawn, seen in a double image, is a ghost of her former self, like a Werewolf star as spirit photograph. Ms. Lawrence’s face seems to have been torn and roughly stitched back together, but she also resembles a monster whose lips are dripping with blood. Joan Rivers’s face is not much more than pale pink splatters; Katherine Helmond suggests a reviled player landing a punch line.

The precedents for these efforts include Richard Prince’s apocalyptic “Sunset” series of 1981, the torn-poster works of the French affichistes and the satiric watercolors of the German Expressionist George Grosz. They show Ms. Rafferty emphasizing coherence, accessibility and perhaps even sauciness, over obscurity and a sometimes off-putting penchant for stripping away medium or medium of color, violence and unturned emotion — has also been set loose, full of promise.
