Rachel Uffner Gallery Booth C9

With works by Bianca Beck and Anne Buckwalter

Philadelphia-based painter Anne Buckwalter is already back in New York after her flattened, Pennsylvania Dutch Country–inspired interiors made a splash at this year's Future Fair during the recent New York Art Week. Her quiet domestic scenes are rich in detail and pattern, and the often vacant interiors have just a hint of the sinister about them, lending an edge to their quotidian quaintness. A peaceful kitchen scene seems as if someone has just left the room after making a snack, but just off to the side we see a screen in the next room playing pornography. A bedside table holds a clock, keys, and a hair tie, but also a thermometer, birth control, and a copy of Richard Brautigan's postapocalyptic novel In Watermelon Sugar, bringing ideas of life and death into an otherwise unsuspecting still life.

These paintings are well complemented by Bianca Beck's biomorphic sculptures made of wood, wire, papier-mâché, acrylic, and oil. These tensed, squat forms could be neon-hued crabs, polychromed yogis, or deconstructed stilettos. Their physicality makes them seem ready to leap off their pedestals and scurry away at any moment, further emphasizing the lively presence felt, if not always seen, in the paintings. Pieces by both artists sold on opening day, including 10 of Buckwalter's paintings, for $7,000–$14,000 per piece.
